Sometimes you may find that some app continues to send you notifications. What are you going to do? There are many useful apps that could send too many push notifications, but this doesn't mean you should download them. Fortunately, Android offers you complete control over the way each installed app manages notifications. There are two main ways to stop or silencer notifications on Android to help you resume control of your device. You can choose to stop them well before hitting your device, or you can even prevent them while they appear in real time. He guided you through the foundations for each of the methods listed below. If the device is running "Warehouse" Android or any version not heavily on the theme from the manufacturer (ie, it is not Samsung), head to settings, then select "Applications and notifications" and TAP in which it says "see All Applications. " Here, you will see a list of all your installed apps. Touch any app you want to check the notification settings, then tap "Notifications" to view all the options available for that app. Note: If you touch the three-point menu at the top, then tap "Show system", you can also check the notifications of the system apps to measure. You can disable all notifications for an app by activating the "Notifications" shows off location. Quite easy! But what if you wanted a multiple tuned check on your notifications? Well, under notification to deactivate, there is a set of options known as the "notification channels". This allows you to choose exactly what types of notifications each app can send you and what they can't. The categories of notification channels differ depending on the app, but simply pass and deselect all types of notification you want to silence for good and keep those with whom you are well. To take it another step forward, touching the type of notification (the actual text) will still have another set of options. It is possible that this type of specific notification makes a sound and pop-up or even overwrite the non-disorder mode. Tweak this at your leisure. If you are using a galaxy device running Android 9 or 10, Android's samsung theme version on your phone is called a user interface.
